Traditional video games have been associated with the color green. For example, videogames, such as "Pac Man," "Halo," "Grand Theft Auto," and "Super Mario," are associated with the color green. These games often depict the player as a little green mascot (e.g., Mario) or some other user-friendly representation of the game (e.g., green patterns, a green character, etc.). The association of videogames with the color green has traditionally been good. However, as videogames have become more complex and technological advances have continued, videogames have become more and more challenging. As a result, some videogames have become less and less green. As a result, videogames have lost their color green. This change in color is problematic. In particular, children may be scared away from the videogames if they are colorless. For example, children may not play videogames if they are colorless. As a result, children who are not old enough to play videogames have limited options to play videogames. Furthermore, adults who would like to play videogames may be unable to purchase videogames because they are not old enough to play the videogames. Videogames are the fourth largest form of entertainment in the world (only behind television, movies, and music) and videogame sales are expected to grow in 2012. Despite the sales numbers, only about 2% of the world's population have a console (such as the Playstation or Xbox) that they use to play videogames. As a result, there are at least 2.5 billion people in the world without access to the marketplace for videogames.
