I'm looking for a portable music player that will play music files with low latency, that is, I want it to sound as good as it would if I just plugged the cable to my desktop. My work currently uses ProTools, so it would be best if I could use a standalone player which would sync with that software. I know of HDJA, which seems to be the best existing portable music player, at least according to reviews. But HDJA seems to run Ubuntu, and I can't imagine Ubuntu is the most low-latency distro out there... So, is it possible to achieve low-latency playback without using HDJA? A: This is a very complex answer. From an engineering point of view, you should absolutely not mess with any player, since they all have different latencies from each other. However, from a user experience point of view, the less latency is better, and it's easier to do, but this one is best. First, the problem is that your definition of low latency is not even well defined. There are at least 2 dimensions: How jittery is your audio? Is it a difference of milliseconds, as low as 10
