NASA's Mars 2020 rover is scheduled to launch in July, arriving on the Red Planet in July of 2021. And now the researchers say they may have found water-bearing permafrost on Mars – actually permafrost that has accumulated since the last Ice Age. It's a region of the planet's south polar ice cap called the Columbia Hills, and here scientists may have found evidence that Mars once had water flowing on its surface, as well as a place where the microbes could survive. "This [find] is very exciting for future Mars missions to find evidence of past life on Mars," said Anthony Colucci, a NASA science systems engineer who is heading up the mission's geology and geophysics analysis team, in a statement. "All the ingredients are in place for life to exist on Mars in the past, which is even better for life to exist now." The researchers first discovered a massive amount of frozen carbon dioxide at the Columbia Hills during the Mars Curiosity rover's 2014 Mars Science Laboratory mission. The rover then spent a year drilling more than a kilometer into the permafrost at the site to harvest ice and search for evidence of the previous water cycle, or the way water moves through the atmosphere on Mars. The team spent the past two years drilling at the site to find out if there were Mars microbes living inside the ice. Scientists said that both the Curiosity rover and the Mars 2020 rover are equipped with instruments that could look for any evidence of past life on Mars. "We're looking for past evidence of life, including fossil evidence for organisms that have been buried over the eons," said Michael Mumma, lead author of the study and a research geologist at the State University of New York at Albany. "We really are on the edge of people's ability to detect the kind of life we
